Harry Hall gives a spirited account of the almost forgotten and unknown story of Ada Anderson. He made me realize there's an athlete in each one of us.

Karen L. | Santa Rosa, CA

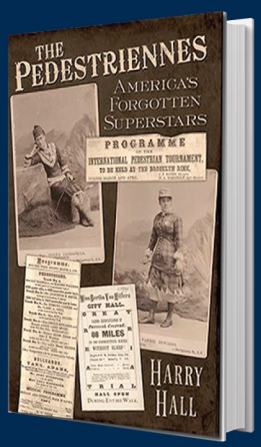
Harry Hall spent 11 years traveling the country, researching an obscure group of a handful of women athletic pioneers who, 150 years ago, made their own rules and set standards that even today, seem impossible.

While only popular for a few years, this group known as the pedestriennes laid the groundwork for the modern sports model, the revival of the Olympic Games, and the suffragist movement.

Harry is a long-time distance runner and spent much of his writing career covering amateur and professional sports. The lessons Harry learned from these women's courage and spirit changed his life.

With his natural delivery, Harry brought the athletes to life. I wish more people told history the way Harry does.

Blair L. | Allen, TX



This was the first book on these athletes, the late 19th century women endurance walkers. The result was, The Pedestriennes, America's Forgotten Superstars, winner of three national writing awards. Writer's Digest calls it, "…a masterpiece of American history."

Since a child growing up in 1840's Lambeth, England, Ada Anderson dreamed of, "Making a name." The restless Ada left home as a teen and spent years of frustration battling failure and personal tragedy, only reaching her dream when she changed professions, tapped a mentor, and moved to America. Overcoming unimaginable obstacles was a way of life but Ada persevered to fulfill her dream.

After researching this riveting true story of determination, grit & resilience, Harry developed his ACT Program of goal setting.

Hiring Harry TODAY for your next meeting will ignite attendees' fearless drive through his use of prolific humor and wisdom of storytelling. This amazing true story of dreams will inspire a more productive, dedicated and happier employee who will experience his/her potential strengths.
